Congressional staffers take stock of Kwajalein's needs

By Peter Rejcek

Congressional staffers on a three-day swing through Kwajalein Atoll like what they saw and have a message to take back to Congress.

"The base has some needs," said Michael Hurt,

Hurt and Greg Thom, legislative director for U.S. Rep. Don Young, R-At-Large-Alaska, were here this week on a fact-finding trip for their respective representatives.

Also making the rounds was Harry Cartland, a professional staff member on the House Armed Services Committee.

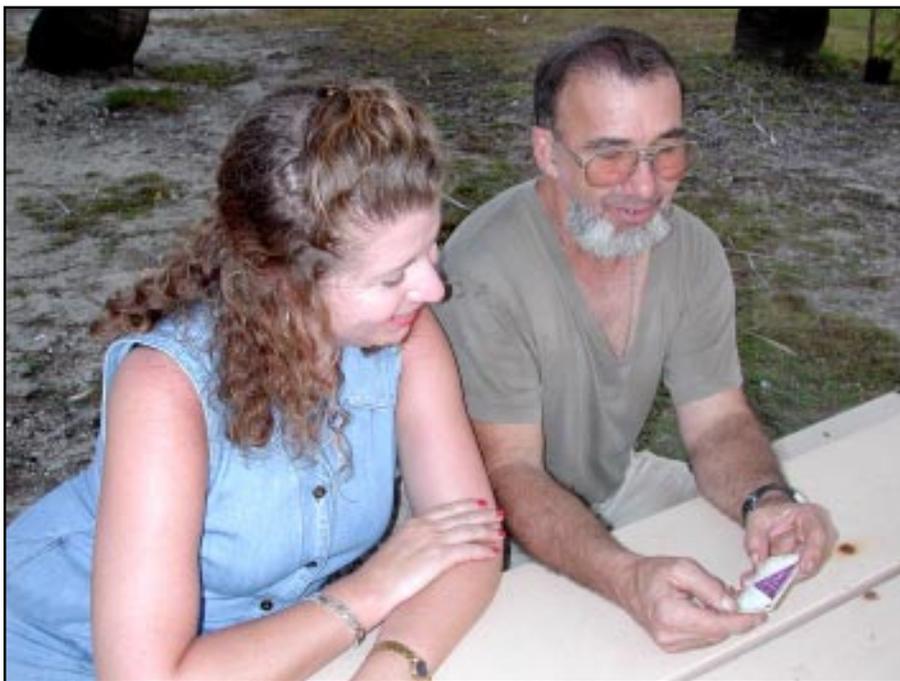

"We all share a national interest [in USAKA]," Thom said, adding that his repre-

Police: Secret Service confirms odd money was counterfeit bills

Former Vietnam POW finds unique Kwaj connection

A theory popularized by the 1993 film "Six Degrees of Separation" says everyone in the world is connected to everyone else through a path of six people or fewer.

Only three people and one wall in the Coral BQ separate two people connected by a 30-year-old stainless steel bracelet.

While living in Littleton, Colo., in 1970 or 1971, Robert Mumma purchased a stainless steel bracelet from the National League of Prisoner of War/Missing in Action Families for just a few dollars, said his daughter Sabrina.

"We had sent away for them," said Sabrina Mumma, who now works on Kwajalein.

Change in Entry/Exit reg expected to ease ferry congestion

By Peter Rejcek
Associate Editor

Beginning today, RMI badged workers can now enter USAKA three hours before they are scheduled to report to work.

The impetus behind the Entry and Exit regulation change was a meeting between RMI workers and the USAKA commander in November on Ebeye, according to Stephan Notarianni, USAKA Host Nation support officer. During the meeting, held to discuss issues pertinent to the RMI workforce, employees expressed frustration over the ferry schedule.

Following a consolidation of scheduled ferry runs in October, employees complained that fewer LCMs meant they had to arrive at the installation well before their work day began because the boats that arrive closest to 7:30 a.m. (the 6:55 a.m. and 7:15 a.m. Kwajalein arrivals) were always packed to capacity.

And when they did arrive early, workers were stuck at the Dock Security Checkpoint until one hour before their work shift began because of Entry and Exit regulations. In addition, the DCS snack bar was shut down last month in a cost-cutting measure.

Increasing the time workers may enter the installation should ease the crowding on the boats and allow employees access to facilities, such as the bakery or their work areas, Notarianni said.

Roi Rat cartoon doesn't represent everyone's opinion

A cartoon in last week's Hourglass [Jan. 25] made me do something I've never done before — write a letter to the editor.

I wanted to make sure that the cartoon didn't make people on the atoll think that this represents the opinion of everyone on Roi.

Our Post Office is doing a fine job. It's manned by a dedicated, caring employee, K. Long. When mail arrives, it is put out immediately, and we often get called to let us know we have a package.

Circumstances beyond human control sometimes affect the mail, but it is certainly not from neglect or with purpose aforethought.

As a direct result of one of the Town Hall meetings we now have extended hours at the post office so that shift workers and reverse commuters can get their mail. A part-time employee was hired for two hours a day, four days a week.

Gimbel's has in the past, and even now, does need improvement. However, we now have a new manager at the store and one on Kwaj. Already there are noticeable improvements. The store is now very clean and organized. Outdated products are not on the shelves. Many new products have arrived, and two new sections are being set up for clothing and fishing equipment.

Changes are evident and it is obvious things are improving.

Some of us who quietly go off to work everyday and keep things moving forward do speak out once in awhile.

Faith Fullerton

You can't afford to ignore technology — or can you?

I got the letter in my mailbox this week. My membership in the Luddites Association of Zealous Yearnings, or LAZY, has officially been revoked.

My fall from grace from this technophobe group probably began during my first fumbling attempts to access the Internet at the local library. (Interestingly enough, a search for Luddites and Luddism, an anti-technology movement started in England during the Industrial Revolution, came up with more than 17,000 Web page matches.) Since that time, I've shamelessly used e-mails, surfed the 'Net and finally broke down and bought items on the Internet. I've yet to cross the line and order anything from e-Bay. Yet.

But I've crossed a different line this week. Amazingly enough, with only 1.5 square miles of space, I find that I've got too much to do and not enough time out here.

I've started looking for a Palm Pilot. May Ned Lud, mythical founder of the Luddites, forgive me.

Technology really is insidious, when you think about it.

It's not the abject addiction to technology that afflicts millions of people and destroys thousands of lives. It's not the desensitization that has eroded our language skills and the way people relate to one another. It's not about carpal tunnel syndrome or eye strain.

No, it's about the money. Do you realize how much one of those little suckers costs? I mean it can't be much more advanced than a calculator. Sure, it's a more powerful computer than they had for the Apollo missions, but I'm not trying to reach the moon. I just want a really cool address book that beeps when I've missed an appointment.

After a titanic struggle of conscience and checkbook, I think I'll stick with my desk calendar and slowly disintegrating address book. It's a lot cheaper. It keeps loggers in the northwest gainfully employed. And with no batteries to worry about, I won't lose contact with old high school friends should a catastrophic failure wipe out my memory.

In fact, I should give my old buddies a call, but that's kind of expensive, too. Maybe I should invest in a cell phone ...

Lining it Up: Barbella contributes to math journal

By Barbara Johnson
Feature Writer

It turns out that waiting in long lines isn't just frustrating, it's also the subject of mathematical studies, called queueing.

Since the early '90s, Peter Barbella's seventh- and eighth-grade math classes at Kwajalein have conducted their own studies of queueing, which were described in an article he co-authored last year.

"Exploring a Queueing Problem Through Human Simulation," by Barbella and Murray Siegel from Sam Houston State University in Texas, was published last spring in the international quarterly journal, "Teaching Statistics."

"Some people think math is cut-and-dried," Barbella said, but "we try to use a practical problem. This is something businesses look at. They want to expedite moving of customers."

In the queueing simulation, students actually pretend to go to an establishment that has lines and wait in two types of lines. Then they use math to determine which type of line is better for customers.

Using random number tables, each student is given an arrival time and a transaction time.

The students line up, wait in both types of line and record the time it takes to reach the teller. The first type has a line for each teller. The second type has one common line that feeds all tellers. Then they explore how these lines work, Barbella said.

"The statistic of interest is how long they wait on line," he explained.

Although standing in line is a common experience, albeit maybe less so at Kwajalein than in the states, the study actually "can be complex, using advanced math," Barbella said.

Barbella used the project at teacher workshops in the '80s, he said. "It worked well and was popular, very well received."

"The simulation makes it accessible to middle school kids," he said. Also it's a nontraditional topic and helps teach writing.

"The results are sometimes surprising," Barbella said. "Most people would go with the smaller average wait, but we also look for measures of variability, such as range and standard deviation." They realize it is better to have all the customers wait about the same time than have most served quickly and a few wait much longer. "The standard deviation would measure this. It shows the students how this important statistic relates to something in their everyday lives."

Explaining that there are many variables, Barbella said, "I don't know the answer ahead of time either ... how it's going to play out each time."

During the project, the students write up their results.

"They do all the math, graph the data and calculate measures of variability," he said, adding that the class also discusses the results and the pros and cons of each type of line.

The study may involve a little psychology as well. Barbella explained that students usually realize that the fairest method is the one in which people are served in the order they arrive at the establishment.

"People don't get upset if the average wait is about the same for each customer, but invariably somebody waits a really long time. This alienates the customer," he said.

The classes find that the single-line queue has a more consistent wait, even though the average wait may be less for the multiple-line queue, Barbella said.

Barbella and Siegel developed the project in 1984 at a fellowship at Princeton University.

The goal of the project is not the solution to the queueing question, however, Barbella said. The students are involved in an activity they see as meaningful so that the practical uses of mathematical tools become evident.

"We're trying to illustrate an open-ended problem," Barbella said. "There's no one answer. A student could make a case for either type of queue."

Counterfeit money case closed ...

"It was only $40, which is a little amount," said Lt. Moses Moreno, Kwajalein Police Department investigator. "There may be a lot more out there, usually one-dollar bills."

A $20 bill was found at the Bank of Guam on Ebeye, while the other three bills, two $5 bills and a $10 bill, were found at Kwajalein's Bank of Guam—one turned in from Ten Ten and one from the Three Palms Snack Bar, Moreno said.

The money looked unusual because the paper was smoother and the ink darker, he explained. A quick check with a detection pen at the Bank of Guam locations here and on Ebeye indicated that the bills were counterfeit, but they were sent off-island for expert verification.

"There is no idea where [the money] originated," Moreno said. "We don't know if it was done here or off-island."

With no additional leads, the case is currently closed.

"The Secret Service will take control of the money," Moreno said. "If we do come across a source or if we find more money, we will reopen the case."

Asking residents to turn in any money they suspect as counterfeit to the police department, Moreno said that since last fall "a couple" of people have stopped by with what they believed was funny money. But so far, no other fake bills have been found.

"Most people are reluctant to turn in money because they will lose the monetary value," Moreno said. "But they will get a big thank-you if they prevent any counterfeit money to go out. It hurts the merchants and individuals."

Soldiers hurt in accidents

From Army News Service

MACDILL AIR FORCE BASE, Fla. — Fourteen soldiers were injured when a Chinook helicopter crash-landed in Afghanistan Monday and another five were injured in a forklift accident.

The CH-47 helicopter accident occurred near Khowst, Afghanistan.

The forklift accident occurred at about 10:30 a.m. (EST) Monday. The five soldiers injured were supporting Operation Enduring Freedom.

New reg welcomed by RMI employees ...

"Some of the shops have showers, like Aviation," he noted.

The change was greeted by approval from managers and employees.

"We've had a lot of employees who wanted to come in early," said Jack Riordan, RSE manager of RMI Employee Relations. "It's a good thing. We're glad to have it."

Helmer Emos, lead operator at the RSE Reproduction shop, said he believed the new reg should help ease boat overcrowding. "It really gives us more leeway," he said.

The DSC averages nearly 1,200 in-bound badged workers, according to figures compiled by the Kwajalein Police Department in December. Non-badged visitors from Ebeye average around 300 daily.

Police Chief Kevin Dykema said the earlier arrival times should have minimal impact on the DSC police operation, though he said it would likely cut down on the congestion that builds around 7 a.m. at the checkpoint. "We'll have to see what happens," he said.

RMI badged employees are still required to leave the island three hours after their work schedule ends, he said.

Notarianni said at least one department, FOM, is adjusting the work schedules of as many as 75 Marshallese employees to accommodate earlier arrival times. FOM is one of the biggest employers of RMI workers, with an estimated workforce of 400 Marshallese.

Staffers: Kwaj key in missile defense ...

sentative is particularly interested in Kwajalein and its role in the Ground-based Midcourse Defense system. Alaska is to play a key role in the future deployment of the system.

In addition, Kwajalein and Alaska are partners in the government's vision of a Pan-Pacific testbed of missile defense, according to Cartland.

"There's a lot more going on out here than I thought," he said.

Added Hurt, "[Kwaj] will grow in its significance."

To help it grow, the staffers agreed the range needs support from Congress. Thom said one immediate need is increased bandwidth, a message he will take back to D.C., as the concept of the Pan-Pacific range comes to fruition.

"All the ranges need to work together," Thom said.

CILHI staring down mid-February deadline ...

"We're trying to do this systematically," Fox explained. "We're not going to quit until everything has been tested."

"The team is optimistic," he added.

The CILHI team has been chipping away in the empty field since early January, working against the clock to find the grave of nine Marines who were executed on Kwajalein following a raid in the Gilbert Islands, just south of the Marshalls, in 1942. Several air crews are also believed to have been executed and buried on Kwajalein as well, probably in late 1943 or early 1944, just before the U.S. invasion, which marks its 58th anniversary this week.

The team has until mid-February to recover the bodies or at least prove it is making significant progress toward that goal. Fox said he would likely make the call on whether or not to extend the dig deadline by Feb. 7.

Time is not the only enemy of the team. Strong trade winds and dry conditions continuously blow dust around the site, covering up features seemingly as quickly as they appear. Excavators use a hose donated by the fire department to wet down the surface. "When it gets wet, [the features] show up better," Fox explained.

Also slowing the work is the uncovering of ordnance. Monday, the team found a live five-inch shell, stopping work for a couple of hours until it could be removed.

"It wasn't fused. It wasn't fired," said Sgt. 1st Class Ted Taala, EOD tech with the CILHI team, who spends more than 200 days a year in the field on recovery missions. Taala said the team is definitely making progress, as they're able to date features as they emerge.

"It's like looking at a map," he said.

one that my father had was Mr. Will.”

Former Vietnam POW Edgar Will also works on Kwaj. Until he walked into the Finance building last Saturday and Mumma asked if the Hourglass had talked to him about the POW bracelet, he didn't know he had an unusual connection to his next-door neighbor at the Coral BQ.

Mumma and Will met with the Hourglass at Café Pacific last Tuesday to talk about the Kwaj connection.

The bracelets were used to remember POWs and MIAs. The money raised was used to draw the public's attention to the missing men through bumper stickers, buttons, brochures and ads, according to the Origin of the POW-MIA Bracelets at www.miafacts.org Web site.

Once a person put on the bracelet, the idea was to wear it until the person named on the bracelet was released from captivity, Mumma said.

By the time Robert Mumma started wearing the bracelet, Will had already spent more than two years as a POW.

On March 11, 1968, in the middle of the night, Will, a field medic, found himself flying out of his home base of Pleiku, located in the central highlands of Vietnam, on a medical evacuation mission.

“We were on call at a minute's notice and we were only given the coordinates to go to,” Will said.

The helicopter came under attack from ground fire just as it was getting ready to land.

“The co-pilot was killed on the controls; the pilot was not able to control the [helicopter] and we crashed,” Will said. “When we hit the ground, [the pilot] went one way and I went the other. I heard small arms fire for what seemed like an eternity. When I heard the last of it, I started to try to find out where I was, someone said, ‘Hold it right there.’”

An enemy soldier shoved a rifle in his face, he said.

For the next “four years, 11 months, two weeks and one day,” Will was a POW.

Due to a change in command of his unit, Will's mother was not notified that he was MIA.

“Approximately 30 days later when she hadn't heard from me ... she sent word to the commander, ‘I know there is a war going on, but why haven't I heard from my son?’” Will said.

Once the new commander found out about the helicopter mission, he sent a belated letter to Will's mother informing her that her son was missing in action. Two months later, the U.S. Army sent another letter, which classified him as a POW, Will added.

Where he was kept and how he was treated got better over the course of his long captivity, but the meager rations never changed.

“I was able to go on a very strict diet when I was in Vietnam,” Will said with a sense of humor. Over the course of almost five years, the five-foot, five-inch medic went from 140 pounds to 96½ pounds when he was released in 1974.

“Our diet consisted of a cup of rice a day. On Friday, they put fish water on it,” Will said.

During his captivity, he was moved to different locations under different enemy commanders.

“We moved around a bit; we weren't kept in one location for a long period of time,” Will said. “I can only say some [camps] were better than others, some of the people were better than others. We were kept in our own little areas. They didn't want us to communicate with each other.”

But communicate they did, mostly with sign language, he said. They warned each other about particular guards or just asked each other how they were.

There were beatings and some very sadistic camp commanders along the way.

One commander would greet each POW by putting a gun under the prisoner's chin, sometimes pulling the trigger, sometimes not, Will said.

“You never knew if it was your day to die,” he said flatly.

In 1974, the American Red Cross, accompanied by other dignitaries, visited the camp where he was held, Will said. Thanks to that visit, eight men, including Will, were released on Feb. 18.

“We were blindfolded and we didn't know we were getting released,” Will said. “We were put in the back of a truck and driven around a bit ... I don't know where we went. They took the blindfold off and it was early morning.”

The POWs were still shackled and told to “keep on moving or you'll die” by their captors, he said.

“We went across a little pontoon bridge and we were met a military entourage of American people,” Will said. His long incarceration at an end, Will was flown to Saigon for a medical evaluation and then to Japan for a week, before heading to San Diego for a reunion with his mother and father.

Soon after Will was released, a notice appeared in the papers and her father took off the bracelet, Mumma said.

Meanwhile, after a period of rest and recuperation, Will reenlisted in the Army, this time as an engine mechanic.

“I had seen enough as a medic already,” said Will, who retired from the Army in 1984 after 20 years.

Originally at USAKA for a three-year tour beginning in 1992, Will returned Dec. 3, 2000, working at Roi-Namur. Later, he put in to transfer to Kwajalein. It was the transfer that alerted Mumma to the long-time connection.

“When I was working in HR [Human Resources], I saw his paperwork coming through and I kept thinking, ‘I know that name, I know that name from somewhere,’” Mumma said. “It wasn't until he made the move from Roi to down here, that it clicked because I had heard at that point that [he] had been a POW.”

“My father has since passed away, but I did contact my stepmother to see if she still had [the bracelet],” Mumma added, explaining that she planned to give it to Will if her stepmother found it. Unfortunately, the bracelet has not been located.

Since they are next-door neighbors, Mumma and Will had talked to each other for more than a year, but the matter of the bracelet was not brought up — until last week.

“Until [the Hourglass] mentioned it, I had no idea about the bracelet, and when I saw [Mumma] at Finance — that was really a trip,” Will said.

They both agreed, “It is a small world.”

Softball begins tomorrow

From staff reports

Spring is here and the 2002 softball season swings into full force tomorrow with a field of 30 teams and almost 400 players.

There are 22 men's teams. They are split into four divisions: Men's A (four teams), Men's C-West (six), Men's C-East (four) and Men's D (six).

Eight teams are signed up in the women's league. They are split evenly into two divisions — Women's A and Women's B.

All divisions sport their own unique format, but teams will play at least 10 regular season games, according to Ian West, Adult Athletics supervisor. Playoff format will also vary according to division.

Features emerging at recovery site

Japanese bunkers. Bomb craters. Trenches. To the untrained eye, spotting these features at the excavation site across from the Japanese Cemetery would be like playing Mensa's version of "Where's Waldo."

Even for Dr. Greg Fox, archaeologist with the U.S. Army Central Identification Laboratory in Hawaii, reading the bumps, dark patches and half-buried structures that are emerging from the excavations to recover nine Marines missing since World War II is not an easy matter.

"We have a number of features we need to look at," Fox said during a tour of the site Wednesday afternoon. At the top of that list is a blackened, elliptical shape that seems to fit the criteria of the mass grave. It's even in the right spot, Fox said.

"I kind of like this one, but I have no idea what it is," he added. "It's about the right size and place, but it could be anything."

Just a short distance away, excavators uncovered what appears to be the top of a Japanese bunker, identified by the exposed, spaghetti-thin rebar protruding from the concrete. In the same area, still partially buried as well, is the shrapnel casing of a 5-inch shell, along with handfuls of propellant. Throughout the area, similar features, clues and fragments are appearing. Another, less well-defined oblong patch of earth is less than a hundred feet from the first. Another blackened area is probably a bomb crater. "It's about what you'd expect from a World War II battlefield," Fox said. "It's a messy battlefield."

To determine exactly what they're seeing at the top, the team must begin to go deep to look at the cross section below. Several small pits have already been dug, exposing cables that date back to the Japanese occupation.
