CREATIVES

at the Spring Arts and Crafts Fair

By Jordan Vinson
Associate Editor

The army of creatives from Roi-Namur and Kwajalein were out in force Monday at the 2014 Spring Arts and Crafts Fair at the MP Room. The many who came were treated to an impressive display of local artistic talent ranging from fused glass pendants and glazed pottery to stained glass, custom picture framing and, of course, first-class photography.

The arts and crafts fairs, which take place biannually, are some of the best opportunities for artists to showcase their hard work, offload old projects to make room for new ones and, of course, make a little cash in the process.

Featured are a few of the highlights from the fair.

Pendants by Schwanitz

Neil Schwanitz > Glass Fuser

Neil Schwanitz has crafted himself an interesting niche: He fuses glass together to make decorative pendants (see above), and he's one of the very few people on Roi and Kwaj to take up the hobby. It seems rather easy to take pretty photographs on Kwajalein. But fusing glass? That's a different story.

Schwanitz learned the trade only 1.5 years ago, but he's come a long way since then. "My sister does it and we took one afternoon class when we were in Texas," he said. "I said, 'OK, I can figure this out.'"

Adopting the Roi Hobby Shop as his laboratory, Schwanitz has spent many hours experimenting at the kiln, firing different designs and glass types to accumulate a great number of pendants, each one different from the others.

His process revolves around a method involving stacking, or layering, individual sheets of glass on top of one another to create a desired pattern. After a stint in the kiln with temperatures up to 1,500 F, the individual pieces fuse together, becoming one.

But there is only so much control a fuser has over the final product that comes out of the kiln.

"You try not to get bubbles," Schwanitz said. "Using firing speeds, you try to do it really slow."

Because pieces of glass made of different compositions cool at different rates, they also contract at different rates, inevitably cracking one another during the cooling process. Because of this hindrance, Schwanitz can't go out to the shoreline and gather up a bunch of rounded glass to use in his work. Instead, he sticks with one variety of glass specifically formulated to melt and cool at the same temperature.

Aside from being forced to use specific glass types, there are few barriers to the creativity that fusers can apply to their craft. Schwanitz's use of dichroic glass, for instance—a special, metallic-looking glass which emits two separate colors, depending on the angle of view—has only expanded his horizons. He often fuses pieces of dichroic glass onto other glass to create an interesting contrast in color and texture.

And because he's only one of two individuals on Roi and Kwaj that know how to fuse glass, demand for his art is sure to keep him busy trying out new designs well into the future.

What's next for this fuser's portfolio?

"I'm going to try to do bracelets," Schwanitz said.

Jane Cavender*> Potter

If there's anyone on Kwajalein that has perfected the technique used to create ceramic tree leaves (see right) it's Jane Cavender, a veteran potter and longtime regular at the Kwaj Hobby Shop. She explained the process:

"There is a piece of equipment at the Hobby Shop which rolls clay flat, kind of like rolling cookie dough. And after you have a flat piece of clay like that, you can cut it to any shape or size that you want. Or you could even press a leaf into the clay and carve around that shape of the leaf. And then you can form the edges any way you want. We usually like to lift them, because after the clay gets fired, you put on a glaze or a series of glazes. And so they don't slide off the edges, we lift the edges so that it all stays in the middle."

Cavender had dozens of her leaves for sale for only a few dollars. I grabbed one and asked what she'd use it for.

"I would use this for a candle holder, a teabag holder or a change dish."

I went a slightly different route: The leaf is currently on my computer desk, serving as a tasteful external hard drive holder. Maybe I should start using candles and drinking tea.

Melissa Dethlefsen*> Photographer

Melissa Dethlefsen, a resident of Kwajalein, is a veteran photographer, one of the many shutterbugs on the island who spend their time trying to capture the perfect sunset and action shot on the beach.

At the Arts and Crafts Fair she said she enjoyed watching people stroll through the MP Room to vote on their favorite pictures submitted for the KAG Photo Exhibit and Contest, which will be announced next week.

She didn't enter the contest this year. Instead, she busied herself preparing her own prints for the fair.

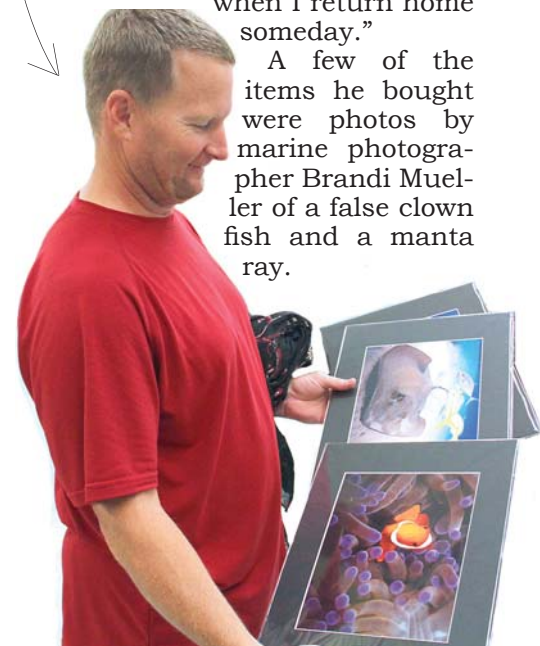

"The best aspect of being a photographer on Kwaj?" she asked. "You can't take a bad picture."

Curtis Childress*> Art Shopper

Curtis Childress was one of the hundreds of visitors at the Arts and Crafts Fair Monday looking to score some unique mementos and decorations for his living quarters.

"I'm just here to look for some Kwaj memorabilia," he said. "The event often shows local talent and craftsmanship, which will be good stories for me to tell of my stay when I return home someday."

A few of the items he bought were photos by marine photographer Brandi Mueller of a false clown fish and a manta ray.

Evelyn Smith*> Potter

Evelyn Smith, one of the 18-or-so artists who participated in the fair Monday, is a major fan of the biannual venues.

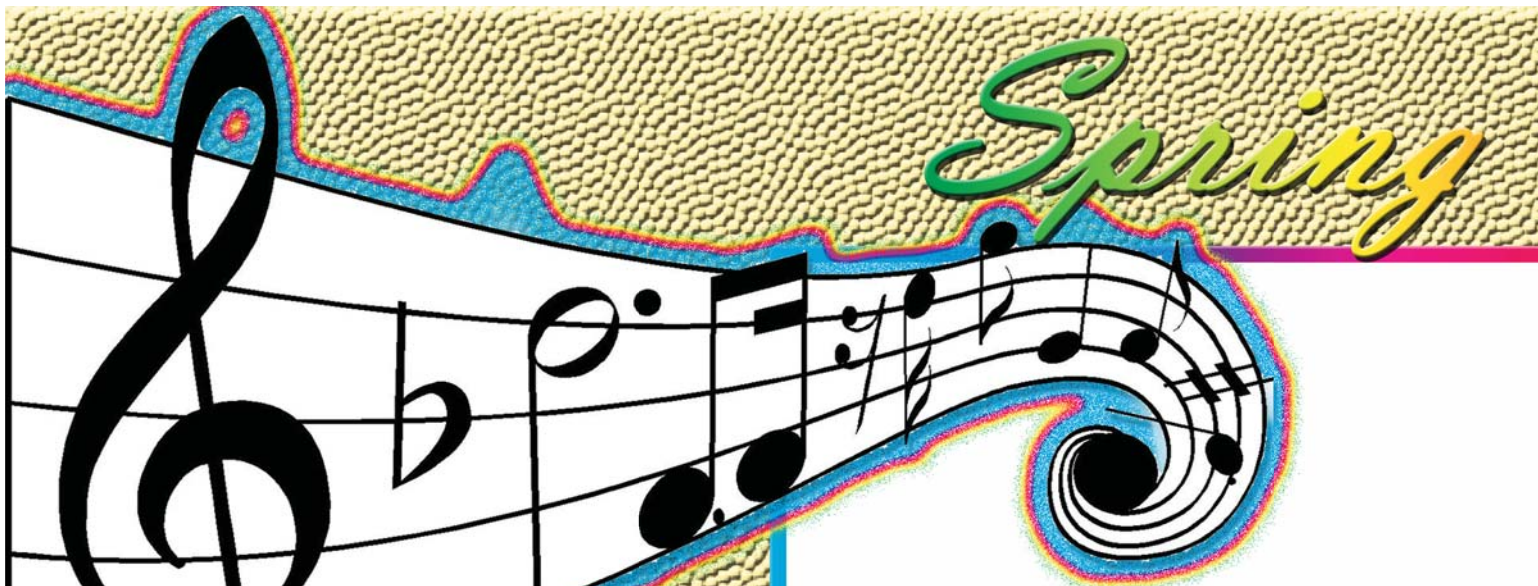

"It's just a really good event," she says. "It's good to, you know, support the local artists, whether they're photographers or potters or whatever."

"I've sold probably 20-25 pieces."

The tribal mask featured at right is an example of her work.

The Spring Break Music Fest may imply music is the only entertainment of the day, but that was certainly not the case at Emon Beach Sunday. While island musicians entertained at the Emon Main Pavilion, several other activities were ongoing to keep island residents amused.

Three competitions delighted the taste buds of island residents: the annual Chili Cook-off, homebrew contest and barbecue cook-off. All tastings were free, but donations were encouraged for the Kwajalein Kidney Fund to support Ric Fullerton and Angela Mitchell. In total, $3,065 was raised.

Winners of the Chili Cook-off were: first place, Bob Sholar; second place, Jim Severson; third place and People's Choice, Mandie Morris. The homebrew contest had 18 entrants and after 91 ballots were totaled, only four points separated the top five brews. First place went to Wes Kirk for his P-town Nut Brown Ale; second place went to Jim Stepchew for his Black Hole IPA; and third place went to Jim Hall for his Hafricot Ale. Keith Peacock claimed the rest of the prizes for wine and soda. Winners for the barbecue contest were Ben Bartyzel for traditional pork and Jerry Leverett for the open category pork.

Break Music Fest

Kwajalein Running Club volunteers kept kids busy on the bouncy house and slip-n-slide inflatables. Kids were also able to get their faces painted like cats, Spiderman and more in the craft tent.

The dunk tank gave kids and adults alike the opportunity to send their coaches, boss or friend splashing into the water. Laura Gimple, 7, astonished the crowd with her accuracy. She was five-for-five every time she threw the ball at the target. While that was good news for her and the crowd, poor Harden Lelet, who was the unlucky splashee, would have fared better if he just stayed in the tank.

No matter what activity you were enjoying, the wind carried the music from the Emon Main Pavilion to your ears. The day began with a few one-man shows by Andy Carden, Dan Hopkins and Dan Eggers. Ed and Patrice Kramer performed a few of their favorite blues and folk tunes in the early afternoon. The next performers were an eclectic group with members switching out every few songs. They covered bands like Chicago, Fleetwood Mac and The Grateful Dead. First-time performer Tennille DeMello had audience members commenting on how well she sang her Stevie Nicks songs. The crowd also showed enthusiasm when Peacock, David Sholar and Jeff Wrobel rounded out a horn section for a few songs. The singers took a break while Karen Brady's Tiny Dancers performed in their bright, pink outfits. Drum Down the Sun did just that – bid farewell to the day's rays with enthusiastic beats. The final performers of the evening were Pure Polynesia, whose serene tunes paired perfectly with the dinner hour.

While the Spring Break Music Fest was a shorter program than previous years, the entertainment was a relaxing way to end spring break.
